Report

Population distribution, migratory trends, and demographic trends were all thoroughly examined in the PG students' seminar on population geography. Students gave case studies on population aging, urbanization, and migration's effects on local development. Engaging conversations about how population policies might address global issues like resource management and overcrowding were promoted by the event. The significance of geographic tools in the analysis of population data was emphasized. In general, the event proved effective in augmenting students' comprehension of population dynamics and its consequences for both society and the environment.
